BOYS AND GIRLS WEEK OBSERVED BY ROTARY CLUB

Fr. Brown Luncheon Speaker Wednesday; Training of Boys Stressed

Girls' Week, the Avon Park Roadster Club, at their luncheon Wednesday, heard an excellent talk by Fr. R. I. Brown, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, on the needs of proper training for the younger generation. Fr. Brown was formerly court probation officer at Tampa and drew on some of his personal experiences for some of his illustrations.

Fr. Brown said it is time some one took an interest in the boys and girls and then mentioned the proposed child labor amendment. The problem of child labor is acute in the southern states, he said. It has been reduced in the factories but not in agriculture where it is not a physical hardship but kept the children out of school.

Using the old time phrase the boys and girls of today are the men and women of tomorrow, Brown said they must be trained in the right way to take the place of those now in business, but like Mark Twain and the weather, little has been done about it.

Every child in the community should be equipped as a citizen in every way mentally, morally, spiritually and physically. He cited the good done by the Boy Scout organization which appeals to boys. Similar work to a lesser extent has been done by girls' organizations.

placed on training leaders, he said. "I don't want to be understood. More people are needed to carry out well formulated programs. Avon Park has schools of which the city can be proud. They are well conducted and ranked among the best in the state, he said.

Mentioning crime statistics, speaker said the average in Tampa is low compared to that of the rest of the country. In Tampa one in 100 have been in court for some violation while one in 20 is in court for the country. Lack of adequate training in citizenship was the cause of the crime rate.

The reasons for boys getting into a life of crime, he said, are:

1. Running with a gang and criminal tendencies. A boy is to raise himself in the estimation of the gang members.
2. Economic, wanting clothes, taking a girl to a show, not knowing how to get a job, not being shown how and wanting happiness.

Most of these are not b

The energies of the boys girls must be directed along right lines and raising boys girls in the right way is a round job and should be the business of a life time work. I look up to those older than myself and imitate the things they do, hence everyone should be careful of their actions, Fr. E. concluded.

A FRIGHTFUL PRICE.

The highway slaughter must go on, so far as the Florida legislature is concerned.

Bills to make owners of cattle keep their stock off the highways have been given scant encouragement. In fact, it looks at the moment as though they will be discarded without further ado, because the livestock committee of house and senate are composed principally of men pledged to keep the laws safe for the cattle industry.

From the very governor of the state word has gone forth that motorists must ride the highway at their peril, and that it is not economic for the state to restrict livestock owners. This naturally is the viewpoint of north and west Florida, where one of the chief industries is growing cattle on land that belongs either to the state or to someone else.

The greatest barrier to effective action is the fact that many of the present cattlemen cannot afford to own land. And those who are not interested in fencing it. Both cost money. It is cheaper, so long as a complacent state permits, to range their cows and hogs, and goats and mules over an unlimited area, with special grazing facilities arranged alongside the state roads.

So these interests elect enough members of the legislature to insure themselves against restrictive laws. It is easier to finance a legislative campaign than to build fences. It is cheaper to rely upon police than upon economic justice for profits. Because that is so, the winter visitor interests of the bulk of the state must suffer by reason of dangerous highways, and with it the Florida residents who are being killed or wounded at an appalling rate on the highways of this state.

The discouraging feature of the present situation is that action must come sometime. We know that such movements where human lives are destroyed by menaces to society eventually get up enough strength to push aside the selfish interests that block their way. But from all reports the public this year will be deprived of reasonable highway security from livestock because a few willful men are permitted by what some are pleased to call "legislative courtesy" to block the way.

A few score people must die, many hundreds must be injured, and thousands of thousands of dollars' worth of property must be destroyed because those men serve their masters and not the public. It is a frightful price we pay for having such men in charge of our government.—Miami Herald.

DEPUTY OF THE DEVIL

By BEN JAMES WILLIAMS

"As a matter of fact, this was worse than carelessness. With that particular pistol, the barrel is empty, the action stays half-open. The fact that it was closed should have warned me that there was still a cartridge in the barrel. I was incredibly stupid!"

There was a moment's silence. Then Jerrell said uncomfortably:

"Decent of you to say that, Ned. But after all, if I hadn't pointed the gun at Dan—"

He added, in an incredulous recollection: "I didn't mean to, tried not to. I can't understand it, even now. It was exactly as if some one's hand, on mine, swung the pistol toward Dan—"

"If it had been empty, you could have done no harm," Doctor Greeding insisted.

Professor Carlisle looked keenly at the Doctor. "No one is blameable for an accident," he remarked. "This of course was an accident. Let it rest so."

And he repeated his question of a moment before. "You think he will recover?"

"Yes."

"Why?" the older man inquired. "On what signs do you rely?"

Doctor Greeding hesitated, shook his head, smiled. "I don't know," he said. "Instinct. A guess, perhaps."

He chuckled. "Or it may be that I'm relying on my luck. I was born under a caul, Professor. The old women say that a sign of luck, you know; and I've always been lucky, certainly."

Professor Carlisle sat down, almost suddenly, as though he were tired. His eyes still on Doctor Greeding's face, he filled his pipe and lit it. So presently he spoke.

"Born under a caul, were you, Doctor?" he repeated thoughtfully. And he said: "I remember you once told me some strange superstitions of a friend of yours, who was also born under a caul."

Doctor Greeding felt his cheek flame, then the blood drained away, and he cursed his folly, his own loose tongue. There was no accusation in the Professor's tone; yet Doctor Greeding felt himself accused.

"Yes, so I did," he confessed lamely.

Professor Carlisle puffed at his pipe, his old eyes stern and still. "Strange things do happen," he said gravely. "—some things too dark for the human mind to contemplate."

He met Doctor Greeding's glance. "I perceive," he said, "that Dan sees Dan—"

"Yes. I am much pleased," Doctor Greeding said hurriedly.

"You do not—object?" the Professor asked.

"No," the other man assured him. "No," he said. "Strange things, yes. Dan's recovery—think he will recover—is almost like a miracle, for instance. Something like an appeal for mercy was to his tone."

The old man said indifferently: "Yes. He does recover."

And at that abruptly, Doctor Greeding turned away and went out through the billiard-room to where Dan lay. He questioned Mary Ann with a glance.

"He's fine," she said. "Not much pain, and no temperature. Doctor, you mustn't doubt. He'll get better."

She smiled heartily. "He's bound to. This is one of your miracles, you know."

"I've already twenty-four hours," he reflected. "Wound draining?"

"Perfectly."

"I'll stay with him for a while," he suggested. "If you want to rest."

And he did in fact stay close to Dan's side during the days that followed. This was not all solicitude for Dan. It was in part defensive: some as long as Dan was near Dan—was so conscious and rational now—be not need not be alone with Professor Carlisle.

There was in Doctor Greeding a passionate desire to avoid that wise old man, whose shrewd eyes saw so much, who might at any moment suspect, and even to credit, the incredible. He perceived that questions multiplied in the other's mind; as long as he himself stayed near Dan, who must overbear any question that might be attempted, Professor Carlisle could not interrogate him.

And Doctor Greeding had no answers ready for the old man's unending questions; so he closed to Dan as a bunker and a shield.

He and Mary Ann and Henry stood, suddenly more alert, as he poured his own life and strength into the hurt man. He seemed to feel every throb in Dan's great sinewy fingers. For Dan's strength did begin to return, his color to improve, and his spirits were brave and unshaken.

Doctor Greeding, by contrast, began to look like an ill man. Nancy said him a heavenly tenderness. And Mary Ann entered with her in this conspiracy of gentleness to ward the man who so valiantly grew weary and drawn before their eyes.

She said to him, once, at dawn: "You mustn't wear yourself out, Doctor."

And she added, understandingly: "Father told me you blame yourself for Dan's being hurt. But that's wrong. You mustn't worry. Grief and worry can make you ill, and Dan doesn't blame you. None of us do."

He said: "I wonder if that's why Dan's getting better. Because he's not blaming me, not—hating me. Hate and anger are poisonous things, Mary Ann. They can destroy a man, if he harbors them."

She protested smilingly: "Nobody hates anybody here."

He said gently: "You're a very fine woman, Mary Ann. There were questions in your mind, but he did not ask it. There was no need. To any discerning eye, it was clear enough that between Mary Ann and Jerrell there was a bond which grew stronger in these days under the same roof together. Jerrell seemed younger each day; and Mary Ann was radiant in her garment, and a happy certainty and pride."

The second day after Dan's hurt, there was a change in the weather. It grew warmer, and a hot haze obscured the sky, diffusing the rays of the sun. Dan suffered from the heat, as they all did; yet the day passed somehow after dinner. Nancy and Doctor Greeding went out on the open terrace in front of the house, where a faint breeze stirred. The stars were obscured by the haze across the sky; and Nancy said:

"We need a shower, Father. To clear the air."

He nodded. "Tomorrow, probably," he said. "It's never uncomfortably hot here for very long."

They stood side by side, her arm through his. "But I don't think I shall ever like it here again," she confessed.

He was shaken. "Not Why, Nancy?"

"I think partly because Dan was hurt here," she decided. "And I can't ever be the same without Mother. When he can be moved, let's go back to Cambridge. Father, tell the island."

"I wish you'd stay here with me," he suggested. "For a while, for this time."

She said, with the blind cruelty of youth: "I hate leaving you, Father. But I must be with Dan, always. Life's so short, I know that now. We've so little time. I don't want to miss a single day I might have with him."

"I shall be lonely without you, Nancy," he confessed.

"I know," she nodded. "And I'm sure that's the way the world is, though, isn't it, Father? No matter how much I love you, I must go to Dan."

He assented gravely. "Yes. And I shall try to keep you from him."

She laughed, clinging to his arm, her voice deep and warm. "You couldn't, ever," she whispered ardently. "No matter how you tried. Nothing ever can."

He nodded, humbly, accepting this, and a little later they returned indoors.

Doctor Greeding that night was unable to sleep, but lay with his eyes open, staring at the ceiling. Dawn found him with burning eyes. He went to swim, and found in the water peace and contentment for a while. But later, after he had dressed again, the sultry heat settled down once more, smothering and stifling him. He relieved Mary Ann's vigil by Dan's side, and saw that Dan was now more conscious and rational now—be not need not be alone with Professor Carlisle.

There was in Doctor Greeding a passionate desire to avoid that wise old man, whose shrewd eyes saw so much, who might at any moment suspect, and even to credit, the incredible. He perceived that questions multiplied in the other's mind; as long as he himself stayed near Dan, who must overbear any question that might be attempted, Professor Carlisle could not interrogate him.

And Doctor Greeding had no answers ready for the old man's unending questions; so he closed to Dan as a bunker and a shield.

He and Mary Ann and Henry stood, suddenly more alert, as he poured his own life and strength into the hurt man. He seemed to feel every throb in Dan's great sinewy fingers. For Dan's strength did begin to return, his color to im-by so that he might not be disturbed. And he woke to peace, a content and ordered mind.

Dan was fretful that afternoon. The heat irked him, and returning strength gave him sufficient energy to resent it. Nancy was distressed by his mood, till Mary Ann suddenly reassured her.

"It's the best possible sign," she said. "When a sick man begins to be sulky and bad-tempered, you may know he's getting well."

So Nancy was amused. The early afternoon she spent with Dan—Doctor Greeding was in his room, and she and Dan found themselves involved in one of those arguments without either a beginning or an end, which may arise between two people who are close to one another. He was flushed with something like anger when Mary Ann returned and found them so, and Nancy said laughingly:

"Mary Ann, you stay with him for a while. He's unbearable! I'm going all right, Father."

He shouted: "Yes, of course."

"I thought I heard you call."

He could see Nancy standing by the springboard, looking toward him; his eyes devoured her for a moment. Then he swam on, toward the other shore.

Nancy watched him, his head a dark dot on the lake's mirror surface, as he watched the water and the sky. A veil of rain obscured the farther hills and swept down the lake and darkened the water and raced toward her. It was a deluge, hiding everything. She saw it reach her father and conceal him from her eyes, and she stayed awhile there on the wharf, welcoming the cool downpour on her body, holding up her face to the rain, opening her arms as though to a lover.

The shower continued for half an hour; but long before it ended, she was almost dry, and she went up to the house to dress. She was in her room when the rain ceased, suddenly; the shower was over, and the lake withdrawing like a curtain, like a wall.

It had swept away the hot, stale, stifling air which had oppressed them for so long. Then suddenly the sun shone, wetly, smilingly; the world was washed bright and clean, and beautiful. Nancy had a great sense of well-being, of security. She came downstairs.

Mary Ann and Jerrell were with Dan. She saw Professor Carlisle on the veranda, and went out to him.

"This is better, isn't it?" she said happily.

"Sunshine after rain," he assented. "Nothing more beautiful." Then he asked slowly: "Where is your father?"

She looked out across the lake. "He's over there, on the other shore, I expect," she replied.

He said, in mild surprise: "That's a long swim."

"Oh, he often does it," she assured him.

He looked at her thoughtfully. "For a woman, he swam a goodly distance," he inquired.

She smiled, shook her head. "Not in the least. He'll swim back when he's ready. I'm sure he's perfectly all right."

And she went into the house to be with Dan.

Professor Carlisle stayed there for the day, for a while, and then he went out across the water; but Doctor Greeding did not reappear. So presently the Professor nodded, as though in assent to some remark, as though accepting the explanation of some matter which for a while he puzzled and disturbed him.

"Oh, he often does it," she assured him.

Doctor Greeding swam straight away from shore, yet not with any purpose in his mind save to immerse himself to the embrace of the cool water. Once or twice he paused, looking on his back, utterly relaxed, resting. The island, the world, was far away. Floating thus, he thought, suddenly, that Myra was here beside him; and this was absurd, because Myra had never been a strong swimmer, never ventured far from shore. Yet it seemed to him that she was here, smiling tenderly, her eyes full of the sun and forgiving love of which only women are capable.

It was treacherously beautiful and comforting to think of her close to him; he turned on his side to face her, to speak to her. . . . But she was not there.

He heard Nancy's halloo: "Are you all right, Father?"

He shouted: "Yes, of course."

WHO'S NEWS THIS WEEK...

By Samuel F. Patton

He Keeps Teachers Free

NEW YORK.—Gov. Charles F. Hurley, of Massachusetts, who vetoed the teachers' oath bill, is known as "Smiling Charlie."

One of his best pals is Joe E. Brown, the film comedian, with whom he makes a trip every year.

A self-starter in Massachusetts politics, with his own organization, he has the human touch, and has been disclosing amazing skill as state treasurer in 1930. He was elected governor last November.

He is a Democrat, but his political skill and experience have been largely parochial, with no very definite orientation in national affairs, but on his own home grounds he is hard to beat. This department recently became interested in him on account of his many political blunders insisting that he was a demon voter to whom the national party must in time give serious attention.

He has a big, bulging jaw and physical bulk in proportion, and, if he weren't so amiable, might seem formidable. He played center guard on the Boston college football team, but, with a nice sense of common political values, he refused to talk about his marbles championships at an earlier age. In many such instances he has been successful, the boxer who was only forty-three years old, he hit his big Massachusetts politics with tremendous momentum.

His is the story of the poor boy who never watched the clock and gained fame and fortune. His party died when he was a child and he was reared by relatives in his native Cambridge, where Professor Rogers later was to advise young men to "be a monk and marry the boss's daughter."

He wasn't a snob—quite the opposite—but he did marry Marion Connelley, another was his employer in the real estate business. He was a sporting goods salesman for several years after he had been in the navy intelligence service during the World War and thereafter in the real estate business.

Aggressive, he fought the child labor amendment, writing to President Roosevelt a vigorous letter against it. As a man of the people, he says there will be no gold or red tape in the capital while he is governor.

Fourteen-hour a Day Man.

IN UTAH, the Mormons start a back-to-the-farm movement to help the state's economy.

Senator Reed Smoot, helping shape up the bill, says he hopes the bill will be passed by the end of the year.

At his home in Provo, Utah, he is a director of many corporations, including real estate, insurance, and best sugar interests, which, with his church activities, enable him to round out a 14-hour work day. No hot drinks, along with plenty of work, he prescribes for long life and vitality.

Hot drinks and low tariffs have for decades been Mr. Smoot's two leading public enemies.

Philosophers Versus Kings.

IF WITH hard work, a high tariff on beet sugar and no hot drinks, Mr. Smoot's probable life span should be ninety years. Dr. Henry C. Sherman would rate him a possible ninety-nine if he gets plenty of minerals and vitamins.

Mr. Smoot deals us an extra 10 per cent if we take his inside laboratory test upon nutrition. This idea, which he has been expounding for several years, he elaborates in a lecture before the New York Academy of Medicine.

A Winsome Quartette

THERE was a lull in the mid-morning activities of the Chic Twins in the Barbara Bell Pattern Book. The girls were sitting on their heels, their week-end guests when the candid camera caught this quartette.

The guests are wearing—let's have a close-up—sports dresses because they are so all purpose: tennis, golf, shopping, just as often as not. The spectator model to the right with its unusual use of buttons is demure enough when calling on one's Sunday school teacher and yet would have sufficient swing to "belong" in the gallery at the polo tournament.

Summer days offer so many unexpected opportunities that these dresses are chosen as equal to any informal occasion.

A Two-in-One Idea.

The aprons on the charming hostesses to the left are both cut from one pattern. The clever miss will never overlook a pattern package that offers two such charming numbers for the price of one. The exhibit is over now; feature in one yourself in the very near future by ordering these patterns today.

The Patterns.

Pattern 1276 is designed in sizes small (34 to 36), medium (36 to 40), large (40 to 44). Medium size requires 1 1/4 yards of 39-inch material. Pattern 1315 is designed in sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 40). Size 16 requires 3 1/4 yards of 35-inch material.

After trying many years to win state-wide and local contests, Avon Park high school has accomplished a few of their aims in achievements in the co-curricular activities this year.

When victory looked hopeless, the Avon Park students never gave up. Always fighting to the last, they soon reached the top.

As an example of this characteristic of the school, here are some of the achievements that have been accomplished:

The two girls clubs won two bronze cups as a result of winning first prize at the contest at Rollins College. They also won a second and third place at the State Music Festival in Tampa.

The boys won second place at the contest in West Palm Beach and also second place at the State Music Festival in Tampa.

Two of the boys won first prize at the contest in South Carolina as a result of winning superior rating at West Palm Beach.

In the field of sports, Avon Park has accomplished more than in any other year. After winning the Ridge Conference Championship in football and placing two men on the All-Ridge team, the Red Devils went ahead to again accomplish this feat in basketball.

Three men on the All-Ridge selection, and two on the All-District. From the girls basketball team, one was placed on the All-Conference second team and two made honorable mention.

The Red and White won first place in nine southern states for the best high school newspaper, and the editor received a $250 scholarship in journalism at Emory University. The paper also won second honor rating in the National Scholastic Press Association contest.

One boy won second place in head writing in southeastern contest, and one girl made honorable mention in sports writing.

The debating team of the high school went to the state achievement contest, the contest which was held at Southern College.

We have yet to see what our commercial students will do when they go to the State Commercial contest in Lakeland tomorrow.

Now that we have accomplished these aims, it will be natural for us to keep trying and to never give up.

Robert McGiboney Gets Highest Place In Education Tests

As a result of achievement and psychological tests sent out by the State College Association and the State Department of Education to all graduating classes, the seniors of Avon Park high school rank above the average of the state.

Robert Guy McGiboney, one of the senior class, made one of the highest grades in the state, as well as the highest score in the psychology test, out of a possible score of 400. Robert made 383 points and the highest score in psychology test.

Out of a possible score of 250, he made 201, which is higher by five points than the highest made grade.

The purpose of these tests is to determine the achievement and psychological ability of the students of the state. A student attempts to enter college next fall, the results of the tests will be sent to the college and if the grade is satisfactory no entrance examination is necessary. This is the second year that these tests have been sent out and all seniors are required to take them.

COMMERCIAL CLASSES ENTER STATE CONTEST

Tomorrow at 9 O'clock Five
Begin Business Tests
At Lakeland High

Saturday the Avon Park high school will send four of the best commercial students to Lakeland to compete in the annual state-wide contest.

There will be three typing students to enter. They have not been definitely determined as yet, but the three who make the best speed and accuracy this week will enter. The leaders to date are: Lauretta Reed, Irene Dyer, Barbara Bell, Evelyn Martin and Marguerite Loomis.

These contestants will be determined both by speed and accuracy. The awards for these will be as follows: first place in speed, a silver loving cup and gold medal; second place, a silver medal; and third place, a medal of bronze.

To the student who is the most accurate in both the first and second year division will be presented a gold medal.

In the bookkeeping division of the contest there will be entered by the Avon Park students, Elizabeth Mackay and Leola Holton. There is no first year division for short-hand, and as Avon Park does not have second year classes, no short-hand students will compete.

The contests will begin at nine o'clock and last until three o'clock in the afternoon.

Etiquette Series Finishes This Week

Etiquette for parties and dances in this week's paper will conclude the series of articles published by the home economics classes sponsored by Miss Rhoda K. Thomas, instructor.

Girls should always have an escort. If the boy can escort a girl home from a dance, he should be able to escort the girl to the dance.

The girls should wear their prettiest dresses. The boys should all wear their best clothes.

If you are invited to a home, you should respect that home as if it were your own.

Do not go to a party without an invitation. If you had been wanted, you would have been invited.

The boys should dance the first and last dance with their dates.

The boys should always dance with his hostess.

Show your hostess' mother some attention. If she dances, invite her to dance. If not, sit and talk with her for a minute.

Boys and girls should not begin eating until every one in their group has been served. It would be correct for the boy to get punch or a served plate for a girl.

Do not have a dance or a party to go riding, expecting to return to the party.

Several girls in the class have reported floors, rugs and furniture ruined by cigarettes and chewing gum.

Join in all entertainment suggested by your hostess.

Never appear bored at a party. Girls should never dance with strangers.

Never comment on refreshments served at a party.

Always say "Good Night" to your hostess and her mother and her father, or chaperon if he is present.

Do not use the trite expression, "I surely have enjoyed myself." But say, "It was a delightful party" or "Thank you for remembering me" or "Thank you for the happy evening."

Do all of these things we have suggested and you will not be "among the missing."

Diamond Ball Team To Play Two Games At Head Field at 8

Avon Park's diamond ball team will be seen in a double header to-night at Head Field.

When the Devils visit the Haines City Hornets and the Frostproof Bluejays, they will be facing two teams which are strong to them, since this will be the first time the teams have met this year.

Frostproof has practically the same standing in the Conference as Avon Park. Haines City is rated above both teams by a small margin.

Interviews Justify History and Health-Physical Education as Part of Curriculum In Schools

KNOWLEDGE OF THE PAST GIVES ONE A BETTER UNDERSTANDING OF PRESENT, SAYS FUNDERBURK

Current Daily Problems and Personal Opinions Are Lesson Objectives

(By J. C. STILL)

"A knowledge of the past is essential to an understanding of the present," said Mr. R. S. Funderburk, history instructor, while being interviewed on "why history should be included in a school curriculum."

"As one historian puts it, the foundation of all progress is a knowledge of the past and reverence for the past," said the instructor referring to some late historian.

"For example, take the Greeks, no influence in civilization has been stronger than that of the Greeks. Much of their long gone world is alive today in our own architecture, sculpture, laws, literature and drama."

Mr. Funderburk says a study of history should do more than create an appreciation for the past. "History is a subject which may be used as an effective instrument for education in citizenship, for the creation of social fashion which makes good citizens, and for justice and a reality. History is classified as a social study, and no social study is worth its salt unless it inspires in the student hope for a better world."

In the history classes that Mr. Funderburk teaches, a lot of present day government affairs are being studied in accordance with that idea.

"Fortunately we live in a democracy where independent thinking is essential. I have no fear of 'isms' in America so long as we have thinking citizens."

The historian says, "You cannot make a Communist or Fascist nation out of America as long as there are 'thinking people' in the nation."

The history classes have been emphasizing an investigation and individual thought. A large amount of their time has been spent reading newspapers and periodicals.

"The average American Citizen," replied the teacher, gets most of his information from the daily press.

After being asked to explain what his pupils did in class, the history professor replied, "In my classes I try to get students to understand present day problems, and form some opinion of what should be done about them. I do not think that they should be guided toward a particular point of view. As I see it, it is my duty to give to my students to have an understanding of current problems and let intelligence tell them what to do."

Mr. Funderburk says that a person who has had a history class has some advantages over a lot of people in life. "Take a newspaper reporter, for instance," said, "he must be able to read a successful newspaper reporter until he has a knowledge of the past."

First Objectives of Education Is Personal Health, As Pointed Out by Mrs. Thomason, - Mr. Bissett

Exercise of Any Type Is Only Towards Character and Body Development

(By CLELAND BELLIN)

In an interview on why health and physical education should be taught in all schools with Coach Herbert Bissett and Mrs. Dorothy Hicks Thomason, physical education instructor, these teachers discussed why the State Department of Education again includes health and physical education as a part of the state curriculum.

Mrs. Thomason answers the question, "why should health and physical education be taught in the schools," by saying, "To develop in the school children of Florida, the habits, attitudes, and knowledge which will secure and maintain health, happiness, and efficiency to the greatest degree."

When asked what future should be sought in physical development she remarked, "Physical education is important in personal habits, character, a program of natural activities, a means of classifying pupils for competition and adequate physical training will afford for the individual or group to act in situations that are physically wholesome, mentally stimulating, and satisfying, and socially minded."

"Four things are included in answering the question, how is a school physical education be carried," remarked Mrs. Thomason. "These include: knowledge of one's own physical abilities and limitations; development of a respectable minimum of physical skill; improvement in personal habits of exercise under proper conditions of time, place and costume; and an appreciation of health, and its contents and relation of its program. In building up physical development and mental ability through physical education," continued Mrs. Thomason, "I think that you learn a worthy use of leisure time; to develop cooperative and leadership through class activities; to provide for group decision on matters of discipline arising in the school; to work for the finer things of life in physical value; and to develop a certain degree of actual physical skill."

"If that that cooperative swimming builds up a character more than any other sport," pointed out Mrs. Thomason, "because swimming uses more muscles provided by kinesiology tests than other sports known at the present time."

"Physical education builds up physical, mental, and normally healthy persons have been kept in a good condition by the use of it," said Mrs. Thomason.

"It should be health and physical education be taught in the school," queried Coach Bissett. "To develop a healthy body to go with a sound mind, to develop good habits to go with a sound mind; it gives a variety in the school program which will keep the interest of the child, and it will keep the child in school; and it will keep the child to have better coordination so that the hands and feet will coordinate with his mind. You seldom see an athlete hit by a car," points out Coach Bissett.

He also said that physical education would teach the child to be associate in play as well as in words and would teach the rules of sportsmanship as well as developing honesty and build character.

"Physical education," remarked Coach Bissett, "should be taught in the first grade through the entire twelve years and have a definite course of study as English, mathematics, history and other subjects."

He brings out the point that football is the best sport that builds up fair play and character.

Another question asked him during the lighting system of different sports, such as football and diamond ball and whether the lights hurt your eyes which he says may mind to not let your eyes if played under a properly lighted field any more than the sunlight.

Mr. Bissett says that "great athletes do not make and drive mad as pointers point out, but do the underminders for the money and fame."

"Although I hate to admit it," said Coach Bissett, "I think Jamie Owens is the best all around male athlete in the world. Edithson the best female athlete."
