Sallie's Temptations

Enters, Warren Fisher of Wall Street I had not meant to accept Elsie Mitchell's house-party invitation, and yet when I arrived at "Dias Dorados" the Mitchell's luxurious estate on the Bay Shore of historic old Pensacola, I was glad that I had used a woman's prerogative and changed my mind to come at the last minute.

In keeping with the informality of the Mitchell's entertaining, the chauffeur had been sent to meet me and I had really enjoyed my solitary drive through the autumnal-scented twilight. Entering the grounds, the atmosphere of the place gave me that rare feeling of exaltation that comes from viewing some perfect scene or painting that satisfies the senses.

"Dias Dorados—Golden Days," I mused. The name was aptly chosen.
I drew deep breaths of the woodsy fragrance and alighting from the car, sped up the steps, two at a time, tinglingly expectant.

The crowd inside was in excellent spirits. Great log fires glowed at either end of the immense living room with its casement doors and windows, overlooking a picturesque river. At the piano, a girl with copper-colored hair and a shutter-green tunic was stunning a minor accompaniment to one of Service's poems.

"And women in a bit-ter world must do the best they can," she sang in a husky voice, oblivious to everything, but the youth with the patent-leather hair who was bending over her.

A great game of some kind was being played by all others in the room.
I edged over to see what was going on and, realizing my presence, the engrossed players glanced up to bid me welcome. It was a crap game.

"Please don't," I begged motioning them back to their places, "only let me get in the game. I'm all ganged up with seven."

I flung my gloves in one chair, my platinum-fox fur in another and taking my turn was soon easily the winner. "Snake-eyes wink at him—inspect 'em and sob, come, eleven—sweet dynamite," I cooed.

"It's the very Sallie talks to 'em," someone good naturedly complained "even the dice are not immune."

"Yes, you make the rest of us look like an Undertakers' Convention," declared a voice behind, and leaning back on my heels, I turned and faced a stranger, whom I noticed was alert in his manner.

"We're 'way ahead of you, too," he continued, "here's something that might give you a little shove in the right direction." He smiled engaging-ly and offered me a tall, frosted glass from which I took one exaggerated swallow.

"That hit the spot, all right," I murmured, "and I haven't the excuse of a hot and dusty journey either, because the trip over was cool and pleasant; but it needed just this little delicate attention to complete my heavenly impression of Pensacola."

We chatted unnoted, the circle having widened.

"So you're Sallie, the Sallie, whose face has peered from society columns all the way from San Francisco to Cuba. I have followed with interest your outcast career and I agree with your throng of press-agents. The minute you came into the room it was like another candle lit."

"Hey there, you two. Come to the party. Sallie is up to you," someone yelled.

"All right, referee; I heard you the first time," I responded, "but I pass the dice. Give me a rain check. I'm going up and associate with some soap-suds and water."

I then to my gallant companion, "See you later, in the meantime I must locate my negligent hostess. She doesn't seem to be properly impressed over my arrival. Thanks, LUNA, for everything," I flung over my shoulder.

I liked this new person. After the insufficient treatment I had received from Curtis Wright on the eve of my departure from Jacksonville, his attention was reassuring. A maid showed me my rooms and while she was unpacking my things, in rushed my bearded hostess.

"Sallie, you angel," making a dive for me, "I'm so glad you decided to come. I started to call the whole thing off when I thought you had faded down on us. You see you're the life of the party and everything's flat without you. We're going to a nap at Ft. Barrancas tonight and it's going to be the most elaborate affair of the season. What are you wearing? It's all in one breath, as I continued my dilemma."

"Oh I tell you what," she went on, not waiting for an answer, "do put on that purple velvet with the bustle back and red roses. You know the Jenny model you wore at the Yacht Club cotillion. Gosh—I hope you brought it. You did, didn't you?" again breathless.

"Didn't leave it," I answered shortly, in the act of drawing off a stocking.

"What kind of slippers do you wear with it? Oh yes, I remember the paper said purple ones with red heels.
How absolutely adorable! You can get away with extreme things, Sallie, but they're not for me. I'm the pink and blue type. Baby blue at that, and believe me, it takes something more and girlish to make a bit nowadays.
By the way," she added as an afterthought, "Have you met Warren Fisher?"

"Sounds like a movie actor. Nope, don't believe I have, unless—" and I described the good-looking stranger who had given me his "Tom and Jerry."

"That's Warren, all over," announced Elsie, "owns half of Wall Street, has a gorgeous yacht and er—" "Yes, yes, go on," I encouraged walking toward the bath I could smell the spicy aroma of dulcify bath crystals in the warm vapor.

"Shh," she put her finger to her lips and looked about in a mysterious manner. "I must have your 'fall and undivided' to tell you about Warren.
I will tell you THIS, though."

The two handsome ten-foot paintings of Sebring and the state of Florida which were done by Gibson Catlett of Chicago, will be taken from this office to the Tampa office which will represent the Sebring realty interests.
