(Bell Syndicate—WNU Service.)

One really has to go back to 1916 to find a presidential campaign as curious in its lineups as this one. This may not be so strange, because it was the war situation which made that battle so peculiar.

For instance, there have been two precisely opposite criticisms of Wendell Willkie with regard to the amendment which would have postponed conscription—the one introduced by Representative Ham Fish and passed by the house of representatives.

One set of critics scream that Willkie should NOT have opposed the Fish amendment. They point out that he did not HAVE to say ANYTHING, and here he was taking issue with the man who will be chairman of the house foreign affairs committee if the Republicans gain control of the house this election.

The other set of critics criticize Willkie bitterly because he does not CONTROL the Republican membership of the house.

METHOD NOT CLEAR

It is not made clear just HOW Willkie would go about doing this. No national convention of any party was ever able to bind the members of its party elected to the house and senate AFTER the convention laid down its dictum.

But while this division in the Republican party has been attracting a great deal of criticism and comment, with Willkie being attacked by both sides, how about the Democratic party?

It just happens that the house of representatives PASSED this much discussed Fish amendment. There is no thought here of blaming President Roosevelt for that, but it could not have passed if a large number of Democratic members of the house had not voted for it. The Democratic majority in the present house is tremendous.

PARTY CONTROL WEAKENS

Now, Mr. Roosevelt, as President and as the candidate of his party for re-election, obviously should have more control of the Democrats in the house than Mr. Willkie has of the Republicans.

This is not an attempt to make a case politically for either side. Both parties are split on every phase of the war issue. Every individual senator and representative, and every candidate for election as such, is going to speak and vote just the way he thinks will do HIM, individually, the most good at the polls in November. If that individual candidate thinks his vote will also help the candidate of his party for President, he is usually glad of it, but that is purely incidental.

This tendency, which might be discussed learnedly as the decay of party responsibility, has been growing rapidly. It is the child of the direct primary. It is the child of the overthrow of the state bosses. But nobody is going to be able to do anything about it this year anyway.

VETERAN SENATORS RETIRING

Almost never before, at this stage of a campaign, have so many prominent figures in the United States senate gone into the discard. With several primaries to come, there are already eight senators who will not be taking the oath again next January.

On top of this, the election prospects of certain other sitting senators are none too bright. Betting odds, for example, favor the defeat of Sherman Minton of Indiana. Chavez of New Mexico, even if he survives the primary, may easily go down in the election, for the Republicans are pretty cocky in New Mexico.

Sen. Peter Goelet Gerry of Rhode Island, who came to the senate in 1916, was later defeated, and then made a comeback, is in grave danger from the prospects of a Republican sweep in his state. Sen. Joseph F. Guffey, first Democratic senator from Pennsylvania in more than a generation, is regarded by political observers as almost certain to lose. In fact, while it is the general opinion that Pennsylvania will go Republican, it is also the general opinion that Guffey will run behind his ticket.

Sen. Joseph C. O'Mahoney, he of the anti-monopoly investigation, is also in danger in Wyoming.

All these probabilities are NOT calculated on the basis of a Republican sweep. They are calculated on the basis of a fairly close election. If there should be a Roosevelt victory anything approaching that of 1936, it would undoubtedly save O'Mahoney, Gerry, and Chavez, assuming he wins the primary. It might even save Guffey, though that would take a bit of doing.

On the other hand, if there should be a Republican sweep, it might carry down several other Democratic senators who are expected by most observers to survive.

BEDTIME STORY by Thornton W. Burgess

GRANNY FOX GETS EVEN WITH OLD MAN COYOTE

Never think you must get even;
'Tisn't nice.
If a wrong you have forgiven,
Do it twice

GETTING even never makes less trouble, and often makes more. Yet it is the most natural thing in the world to want to get even—to pay back wrongs that have been done. Granny Fox is one of the kind who never forgets an injury. If anyone ever wrongs her or one of her family Granny right then and there makes up her mind that she will get even some day, and having made up her mind she never forgets. You see, that is the way the Fox family always has been brought up. Granny's granny felt just the same way, and so did Granny's granny's granny.

So, now when Granny Fox was sure in her own mind that Old Man Coyote was stealing chickens from Farmer Brown's and was trying to make Farmer Brown's Boy think that it was Reddy Fox who was the thief she made up her mind that she would get even with him, and if possible show Farmer Brown's Boy just who the real thief was. She studied and studied how to get even. The more she studied the angrier she grew at Old Man Coyote. She quite forgot the time that she tried to put Bowser the Hound on Old Man Coyote's track in the hope that he would be driven away from the Green Meadows.

As before, Farmer Brown's Boy started out with Bowser the Hound to hunt for the thief.

Granny didn't have to wait long for a chance. It was only a few days later that Old Man Coyote stole another chicken. As before, Farmer Brown's Boy started out with Bowser the Hound to hunt for the thief. Old Man Coyote's track was soon found by Bowser, just as Old Man Coyote had expected it would be. Just as before he led Bowser straight to the private sunning bank of Reddy Fox. This time Reddy wasn't asleep, but he lay still, as Granny Fox had told him to, until Bowser was almost to him. Then up he jumped and ran for his life. Of course, Bowser saw him and started after him, forgetting all about those tracks of Old Man Coyote he had been following. After a little Granny Fox slipped in behind Reddy and, the scent of her tracks being a little the freshest, Bowser began to follow her without knowing it. Reddy slipped away to a place where he could see all that happened on the Green Meadows. He saw Granny run around the Smiling Pool, across the Green Meadows, and finally straight over to the far corner where Old Man Coyote had made his home. Reddy chuckled. He could guess just what Old Man Coyote was saying to himself.

Now, when Granny Fox reached the home of Old Man Coyote she played a very sharp trick. She ran round and round and back, and forth and this way and that way, until her tracks were so mixed up that she knew it would take Bowser a long time to work them out with that wonderful nose of his, if he even tried it. She hoped he wouldn't try to. You see she ran right over Old Man Coyote's doorsteps two or three times, and she hoped that when he reached that point Bowser would realize that he had found somebody's house and make such a noise that Farmer Brown's Boy would come out to see what it was all about.

When she had mixed her trail up enough to suit her Granny made a long jump to one side to break the trail. Then she trotted off a little way and lay down in the grass to watch what would happen. Up came Bowser making a tremendous noise with his great voice. Then he began to have trouble in following Granny's trail, and he would bay only once in a while, as if to let Farmer Brown's Boy know that he was hard at work, but hadn't got it yet. Finally he reached the doorstep of one of the doors of Old Man Coyote's house. Such a racket as there was then! You see Old Man Coyote had been too lazy to run when he heard Bowser following Granny toward his house. He didn't think that Granny would dare to come right up to his door, so he just slipped inside.

When Bowser reached the doorstep he could smell Old Man Coyote inside, and how he did bark to let Farmer Brown's Boy know! Farmer Brown's Boy came over to see what it meant, and then Granny Fox felt that at last she was even with—Old Man Coyote.

Fawn and Cat Adopt Each Other

One of the most timid creatures, this three-week-old fawn has found a close companion in a friendly cat. They are pets of Perk, Joe and Billy Hazlegrove of Roanoke, Va. The animals seemed to adopt each other at sight, and are shown here drinking milk from the same bowl.

Paris Grim City Under Germans

Outwardly No Change, But Presence of Nazis Stifles Activity.

PARIS.—Paris, as the idle tourist or the permanent resident knew it, has passed away.

Arriving from Vichy by train in the early hours of the morning at the drab Austerlitz station is never very inspiring at any time. But arriving under the same circumstances today is positively depressing. Long trains of Reichsbahn cars line the sidings; here and there a sentry in field gray vaguely nods good morning to the railroad men as they pass on their way to the roundhouses. It is still too early for the suburban trains to be running.

In the station itself one is confronted everywhere with unfamiliar signs in German giving directions to get to the "Bahnhofsoffizier" or how soldiers should leave. Here and there stand solitary sentries presenting arms with robot-like precision at the approach of German officers and impassively watching the rest of the crowd pass.

Leaving the station one encounters the first effects of the new regime. There are no buses, no taxis, no private cars. So one is confronted with the alternatives of walking or taking the subway—unless he has a bicycle. Since Austerlitz is three miles from anywhere, and portable bicycles are still uncommon things, most people choose the subway.

Run Many Risks.

Entering the "Metro" anywhere in the neighborhood of a big station at train time is a hazardous affair in the best of times. But entering it now, one runs the risk of crushed feet from heavy suitcases dropped by rushing refugees returning from the provinces.

Arriving in the center of town one finds an even more depressing atmosphere. Outwardly nothing seems changed, but for any one with previous intimate acquaintance with the Parisian his set smile, reminiscent of that on the face of a person going to the dentist, speaks volumes. The Parisian had no choice and has accepted the invasion, but in varying degrees he resents this intrusion of unwanted "tourists." The streets are filled with people, yet they seem empty; there is the usual bustle and hum of a city going about its usual tasks, but one can clearly hear the hollow crunch of half-boots a block away.

'Verboten' Rule Prevails.

"Order" reigns everywhere. Jaywalking pedestrians now cross the streets in the "clous" (pedestrian passages). But the order that reigns is that summed up in the word "verboten."

Food at fair prices—the German authorities decreed that prices obtaining the first of May were legal maximums—is available in sufficient quantities. The "halles" are amply supplied daily, but the military gets first choice.

Transport of food from the halles to each quarter is assured by private cars bearing large S. P. (Service Public) stickers on the windscreens. There is one car for each group of five shops, and each car is allowed six liters of gasoline daily. Woe betide the driver who is caught using this gasoline for purposes other than the transport of foodstuffs, however.

In general, private property has not been touched, although there are several authenticated as well as reported cases to the contrary. But these are exceptions.

Continuing one's search for a "landmark" of pre-war Paris, one finds a sadly depleted American colony, most of which now lives at the Hotel Bristol, on the Rue du Faubourg St. Honore, a stone's throw from the embassy itself. The hotel was requisitioned by the embassy on the urgent demand for shelter by many Americans on the arrival of the German troops. It is now considered an embassy annex and all guests pay their way, those with money helping those without. The German authorities have not interfered with any one there.

Britain Takes Over German Toy Trade

When the British naval blockade shut off German imports and exports, John Bull moved in on Germany's foreign trade. Above is a scene in a toy factory near London where toy armored cars, tanks, hangars, planes and barrage balloons were being made for export. Before the war Germany supplied the world with toys like these. In the face of the "battle of Britain" the toy factories are rapidly being converted for war use, however.

Wife's Weight No Grounds For Divorce, Judge Rules

SAN FRANCISCO.—You may not like it if your wife gets fat, but her weight is no grounds for divorce.

Superior Judge Sylvain J. Lazarus told Julius Boell, bartender, as much as he granted Lucille Boell an interlocutory decree for desertion. Boell testified he left home and sued for divorce because his wife's weight increased in 14 years from 140 pounds to 256 pounds.

The court noted that Boell "has the reputation of being an excellent amateur cook and he undoubtedly contributed to her obesity by supplying her with a superabundance of his excellent cookery."

Racing Pigeons Conquer Tricky Grand Canyon

PRESCOTT, ARIZ.—Pigeon fanciers finally have proved that carrier pigeons can fly from the bottom of the Grand canyon despite the treacherous wind currents in the mile-deep gorge.

Last year, an attempt was made to hold a "Pigeon derby" from the bottom of the canyon to Prescott. There were six starters. Five never were seen again. The sixth was carried from the bottom of the canyon on a mule.

This year, however, there were 25 starters and a majority of the birds reached their cotes at Prescott.

FLYING SCIENTISTS FIND BUGS AT 5,000 FOOT ALTITUDE

NEW ORLEANS. — High-flying bugs are coming in for their share of entomological attention these days as the United States department of agriculture seeks to learn more about aerial bug navigation.

P. A. Glick of the department has released a report on the results of 1,607 hours in the air in 1,314 flights of Louisiana and 44 flights near Durango, Mexico. Glick carried specially designed bug traps on his plane. He would fly with an opened trap at a specified altitude, then close it and move up, say, another 500 or 1,000 feet to get another sample of insect life far above the earth.

Glick found living spiders at three miles altitude, mosquitoes at 5,000 feet and even termites—the kind that eat the foundations from under houses—floating on wind currents in the mysterious upper air.

Behind this arduous and expensive research is an effort to learn more about crop-destroying and disease-carrying insects and just how they spread from one region to another on air currents.

Some bugs do most of their traveling under their own power, others prefer to glide and soar on prevailing winds. Glick says he has captured boll weevils at 2,000 feet, spotted cucumber beetles at 3,000 feet. Leaf-hoppers were found at altitudes as high as 12,000 feet.

The light-weight insects with large wings travel farthest and highest, bug trapping proved.

Glick captured specimens of the pink boll-worm moth, a big-time ravager of cotton, more than a mile above sea level, a fact that convinced him the moth can easily cross from Mexico into the United States without having to undergo the formality of customs inspection.

AROUND THE HOUSE

For a little variety bake your pies in square or rectangular-shaped pans. Often they are easier to cut into equal portions from such a shape.

To keep marshmallows moist, store them in the bread box.

In making toast be sure the bread is at least a day old. Cut it even and rather thin, less than one-half inch; remove the crust, then toast slowly. Cut the crust in half-inch pieces and use as croutons for soup.

A novelty container which will hold several of the handsome vine plants is a clear glass bowl about five inches in diameter. Plants such as the ivy or philodendron will take root in such bowl filled with clear water, and the effect is stunning.

ties and newspaper clippings of stories about herself.

When asked if she had seen an unflattering article about her that recently appeared in an eastern paper she said she didn't know anything about it. The paper was handed to her and after the briefest possible glance at she hastily folded it and stated, "It is nothing but a pack of lies."

It was suggested that such being the case she might ask the publisher for a correction and she replied that her lawyer already had started suit for $100,000. She went on to say that the publisher was "against her" because his paper is "medically minded." When the publisher was mentioned by name a few moments later she said she had never heard of him.

SEEMS TO LIKE IT HERE

When Mrs. Randle arrived in Grand Rapids only a course of eight free lectures, all of which are taking place this week, was announced. Thursday, however, she said she would be here another week for the purpose of "conducting classes which can be taken for $10 a course." The courses which are outlined on printed cards are as follows: "A complete course in natural living, physical culture, breathing, dietetics, food chemistry and longevity"; "Personality, salesmanship, psychology, beauty, charm, speech, voice, talent developing, poise, money making, etc."; "A complete course in rearing and teaching children, child psychology, citizenship development, talent awakening, personality and health"; "The art of money making, building an estate, paying off debts, doubling one's income, accumulating wealth, salesmanship, and starting a business" (the card states that this is one of the best offered); "A complete course in colors (a most unusual, interesting class). Colors as they affect personality, business, health, eyesight, prosperity and charm. What color means. What to wear for different seasons and different types of personalities."

The visiting lecturer is traveling with her secretary and 12-year-old daughter. Mrs. Randle says the daughter's name is Rosalyn but she calls her Eunice. She also is employing several local women to assist in selling her books and corrective food products.

CUTS VISIT SHORT

Apparently Grand Rapids didn't prove to be a lucrative field for the "health and charm" lectures and courses offered here recently by Mrs. Thomas G. Randle, who concerns herself with matters in the field of dietetics and psychology.

On her arrival here week before last Mrs. Randle announced her intention of staying from six to nine weeks, according to those interested in her visit. Thursday night she checked out of a downtown hotel after less than a two-week stay.

Mrs. Randle left a Washington forwarding address, but did not indicate her immediate destination.

THE STORY THUS FAR

Virgie Morgan, widow, and owner of the Morgan paper mill in the Carolina mountain district, turns down a marriage proposal from Wallace Withers. He leaves in a rage. Branford Wills, a young stranger, who has been lost in the mountains for three days, finds his way to the Morgan home. He is fed and allowed to remain overnight. He identifies himself as a government employee, working with surveyors in the district. Wills develops pneumonia and is forced to remain in the household. Marian, Virgie's daughter, dislikes Wills. Trouble is developing as Withers meets Stanley Daniels, the mill's chemist. Virgie learns someone is attempting to obtain title to timber lands owned by Tom Pruitt, life-long friend of her deceased husband and part owner of the mill.

"We"—the older man had thin lips and a mouth that shut like a trap—"are victims of the Phillips' outfit."

Virgie kept silent. Very likely these were some of the crowd who had put up the money to back Phillips. Obviously they had no idea who she was. They thought her a quaint mountain character, probably, so she kept to the part, staring dully and curiously at them, as mountain people did.

Slamming her worn gears, she drove on up the ridge, turning south at her line and bumping across a stony meadow, sun-washed and pleasant.

She found her foresters eating their lunch, their legs dangling from the muddy tail of their truck. She shared their lukewarm coffee, inspected the damp little hillocks where baby spruce stood and shivered, feeling their cold, small bewildered roots groping in strange, chill darkness.

"I hope we get a snow so they don't dry out too fast," she said.

"We heard a car a while back," one of the men said. "See anybody down that way, Mis' Morgan?"

"I was going to speak about that." Virgie screwed the lid on a thermos bottle. "Much obliged, you boys—I meant to get home for lunch but I got delayed, as usual. About that car—I saw 'em. And I want you to quit early—you, too, Joe—knock off before three, leave the truck here, and go over the other side down toward Little Fork. There's a piece of hardwood down there—a hundred and sixty-odd acres. Take a good look at it and call me up tonight."

"Pruitt's stuff, eh?" said Joe, who knew these timbered slopes and ridges as well as Virgie did.

"It used to be Pruitt's stuff. Something's up. And I'm not going to let Tom be gypped by another bunch of slick talkers with blue-prints in their hands and black iniquity in their minds. Don't call up till after seven, hear? And don't talk to anybody but me about this business."

"Sure, boss—we understand. You don't want it mentioned to Pruitt, then?"

"I'll talk to Pruitt. Crank this old caboose for me, will you?"

She was thinking so absorbedly as she drove in at the gate of the plant that she ran over a steam hose and ripped a sizable sliver from the corner of the tool-house before she came to and stopped the truck.

Tom Pruitt heard the impact of her arrival and came slouching out of the back shed, picking gum off the palms of his hands.

"Anybody else bust up the premises like that and you'd fire him," he drawled amiably. "That steering-gear busted?"

"Oh, shut up!" grumbled Virgie, climbing down stiffly.

She was irritated by Tom. No man so huge should be so naive, so helpless.

"Whoever stuck that shanty out there in the way must have thought we'd be hauling stuff in here in oxcarts forever," Virgie continued to fume as she tramped into the office.

Tom opened the door for her. "I reckon Dave put it there," he said, calmly.

"Come in here," Virgie ordered.

Tom followed her obediently and began punching at the stove. Virgie made a complicated task out of getting her hat off and her desk opened. She did not look at Tom. She was exasperated, and when her temper got the upper hand her tongue slipped, and she did not want it to slip. She had to say the right thing to Tom, who was so helpless in the presence of law and finance and the crisscross web men weave of these two strands to hide the simple intent of their acts.

"Sit down," directed Virgie, "and don't squirm. Lucy, you go out and get the time slips. Pruitt and I have got business to talk over."

Lucy rose meekly, put on her coat. "How soon shall I come back, Mrs. Morgan?"

"Fifteen minutes is all I need. And if you hang around that laboratory, walk in the air some before you come back in here. There may be worse smells than young Daniels invents, but Satan has got a monopoly on 'em."

Tom draped his long legs over a stool and twisted his hat.

"I reckon you found a seeder tree cut that hadn't ought to be cut," he said. "I expect I done it."

Virgie swiveled her chair around. The darkened leather cushion on the back of it still held the print of David Morgan's lean shoulder-blades.

"I'm not going to talk about Morgan trees," she said. "I want to talk about yours. Do you know anything about that property of yours over the ridge — that hardwood tract? What shape is it in?"

Tom twisted the hat nervously. "I sold it. 'Way back in '26. You knew about that I reckon. I sold it to that Phillips' outfit. They paid me the first payment. They ain't never paid any more."

"What sort of papers did you get? Have you got a lien?"

"They're all in the safe. Dave put 'em away for me. Dave told me I'd ought to foreclose—then he got down and you know how we been ever since—we ain't had time to think of nothing but keeping this here mill running."

Virgie sighed. "It's my fault, I suppose. I've got to take care of you—just like I've got to take care of Lossie and Lucy out yonder and some more helpless people."

"I got a good piece of money out of that land," Tom defended.

"They defaulted on the contract, didn't they? The company's out of existence. It will take a lawsuit, probably, to repossess it—but somebody's interested in it. I met a couple of men—bankers, they looked like—up on the ridge. They were asking the way to that piece you've got over there—that strip down Hazel Fork with the big poplar on it. You get those papers out, Tom, and let me look into them."

Tom lumbered out of his chair. There was one kind of action he could understand, indorse, and follow. Strange men had been on his land—land that Virgie said was his.

"I 'low them fellers better keep off, over yonder," he boomed, his eyes dour. "I don't know no law, but if that's my poplar them bankers better keep off my place."

"Well, you've got to have the papers first. I'll have Lucy open the safe for you."

But when Lucy came back, mooneyed and absent, with a droop of unhappiness about her mouth, Virgie regarded her with impatience. Lucy had been strung tight as a fiddle lately, making mistakes and being rushingly apologetic about them, jumping when the telephone rang.

Virgie knew what was the matter with Lucy. Young Stanley Daniels was flattered by the sight of Lucy's little silver heart fluttering on her sleeve. He had grown arrogant and cagey.

Lucy needed shaking. So, because she was disgusted with Lucy's meekness, Virgie climaxed a day of exasperations by giving the girl a raise.

"Go out and buy yourself a new hat and some lipstick," she ordered, "and if that young Daniels is hanging on the gate when you start home give him the back of your hand and your chin in the air. I can do all the moping we need in this pulp business."

Lucy was tremulously grateful and husky. "It isn't—that exactly, Mrs. Morgan. It's—oh, everything! Old lamps and the rug wearing out—and food costing so much—"

"I know." Virgie was gentle. "We had a sofa that flopped over and made a bed and my brother had to sleep on it. It was always flopped down in the parlor when I had a beau. Don't let it get you down, Lucy."

At night Joe and Ed reported that the two strangers had walked over Pruitt's land, climbed back into their car, and gone away again. She would hunt up her lawyer, as soon as she had time, Virgie decided, and find out just what could be done for Tom.

Young Mr. Branford Wills was still seriously ill. A half-dozen telegrams had so far failed to locate anyone who belonged to him or who might be interested in him. Virgie had that to worry about.

She took time to hope that Lucy had found a decent hat.

She did not know that Lucy was sitting alone at home, among the ravelings, and that Stanley Daniels was, at that moment, occupying a rocker in front of Wallace Withers' old wood-burning stove, smoking one of Wallace's five-cent cigars and thinking very well of himself.

CHAPTER IV

When he let himself go, Wallace Withers was an eloquent man. He loved to hear his own voice editorializing, expounding opinions, setting the world right.

Now he walked up and down his sitting-room, talking as he had not talked in months, his rough hair standing away from his temples, a flush coming and going on his wattled neck.

This young fellow, Daniels, from the Morgan mill, was a flattering auditor. Middle-age is always a trifle flushed and important when youth condescends to listen. Withers was painting a picture of the pulp business—of the Morgan pulp business, as he averred it could be.

Bigger than any of them, tied in with the big Canadian mills, stacks and vats in batteries, timber rolling in, brown pulp going out by the trainload instead of a single car now and then.

"Dave Morgan was Scotch," he said. "The Scotch build well, but have no foresight or imagination. They want security and they sacrifice other things for it. They let the Irish go prowling around into all the new places, killing off the Injuns, and then along came your Scotchman with a wagonload of goods, for sale, and he took up all the good half-sections. Then they married all the good-looking daughters of the Irish and tamed them down to raise sons to fit this country."

"Maybe they married the Irish girls because, secretly, they wanted to hear somebody laugh," Daniels contributed with a grin.

"Maybe so. Maybe that's why Dave Morgan married Virgie. Virgie was a handsome woman when she was young. She's not bad looking now."

"Rather a fine-looking woman now," agreed young Daniels.

"But darned impractical," declared his host. "Business is getting better fast—but she ain't going to catch up with it."

"Because she turns out a handcraft product in a machine age," stated Stanley Daniels, much pleased with himself.

"You're kind of smart, ain't you?" Wallace Withers relaxed his long jaw. "I reckon you must have collected some ideas about making pulp at a profit?" He sat down, laid his long yellow fingers together, drew his upper lip far down, giving his face a little the look of the skull beneath it.

"If that's my poplar them bankers better keep off my place."

Daniels laughed a trifle nervously. This old geezer had something funny on his mind, obviously; his dry old eyes were full of sly secrets, his knuckles flexed with an involuntary, crushing movement.

"Well, any young man hates to see a business dragging," he said, choosing his words carefully. "Especially when he sees that that business is standing on its own foot, making its own troubles. That's what's wrong with the world now, Mr. Withers—the young people have the ideas and the ambition and the vision and courage—recklessness, I suppose you would call it—and people your age have all the power and all the money."

"Some people," Withers said, "would call you a young fool. But I don't. I'm a thinking man. Personally, I'd like to see what you'd do—running the Morgan mill."

Daniels laughed. "That," he said, "would be a grand idea—but just about as hopeless as most grand ideas. Mrs. Morgan isn't going to surrender the control of that mill to anybody."

Withers did not answer for a moment. The stove clinked, a mouse crept out from beneath an old organ, gave a bright-eyed, terrified look about, scurried back again.

"Virgie Morgan don't own all the stock in that mill," he said, looking straight ahead. "There's some of it loose—and a lot of things could happen. Things might happen so that more of it could be had. She ain't got any considerable reserve, I know that. I know how she's fixed. If trouble was to happen in the mill or orders fell off, she'd be hard put to raise the money to carry on."

Stanley Daniels felt a sudden surge of wry distaste. His tongue tasted of copper, his ears buzzed faintly. So this old hick had ideas in his ratty brain, did he? Trick stuff, likely. He had suspected it.

Let him pull his own potatoes out of the fire, then. Daniels felt very noble and superior as he stood up, pulled down his coat.

"Well, this has been very pleasant, Mr. Withers. But I'm a working man. I'd better say good night."

Withers collected his limbs and scrambled out of the chair.

"But wait a minute—you ain't going to walk? I was figuring on taking you back—car's standing outside."

"I think I'd like the walk." Daniels was smooth, impersonal, inscrutable. "Need the exercise."

"Thunder—it's most five miles. I'll run you down to the main road anyway. You can walk from there if you're itching for air."

Air. That was what Stanley Daniels felt the need for. His overcoat on, his hatbrim snapped down, the door open, he felt honest again. He had had a hunch all along that this dry-eyed old guy was figuring on using him somehow. What made him hasten to be out in the wholesome air again was the awareness that he had been ready to hear Withers' schemes.

He had no inner hypocrisy. He knew that no loyalty would ever blind him to his own advantage. But he did not like being maneuvered, so he sat a little stiffly and replied in polite monosyllables to Withers' remarks, as they drove the rutty road to the highway.

He walked rapidly till he reached the outskirts of the village, his nostrils stinging in the frosty air. The town lay on a slope where the river widened, and as Daniels approached it the linked lights made it look like some jeweled ornament on the breast of the mountain.

He would go down to the mill, he decided. The air was keen and he should be certain that his tests were all right. A freeze would ruin several days' work.

At the mill he moved in authority and this pleased his young vanity. The men he spoke to had to listen. The forms that went out of his laboratory were commands; on them depended the quality of the Morgan pulp.

Only a few men were at the mill—the few who tended the processes that went on night and day. Daniels unlocked his laboratory, a tacked-on structure half brick, half wood, sheeted with metal. He snapped on the light, unlocked the cupboard where he kept his apparatus. His test-tubes, he saw, were all in good order, the thermometer stood at a safe temperature, and the rusty steam-pipe running along the wall was warm.

He put out the light again, locked the place. Then he saw that a light was burning in the office. It was after ten. Mrs. Morgan must be there. Lucy would not come down at night alone. She never came at night.

He stepped up to the office window and saw that the person inside was old Tom Pruitt.

Pruitt's status at the mill had always puzzled young Daniels. He knew that Pruitt had worked there since the plant was built, that he was always carrying messages from Virgie Morgan, giving orders that she initiated, yet he had apparently no definite position and no authority.

Daniels opened the office door. "Hello, Tom," he said. "anything wrong?"

Tom Pruitt looked up from Virgie's desk, where was spread out a loose array of legal-looking papers.

He looked baffled, his hair was standing up, but he grinned at Daniels. "Nope—nothing special. I'm studying out this here. Never did see such fine printing nor so much writing that didn't make head nor tail. You know anything about this here business?"

"Let's look at it." Stanley Daniels slid out of his overcoat.

"You gotta know something about law, I reckon." Tom got up gratefully, surrendered his chair. "I've kept shy of the law for 50 years but now it looks like it caught up with me at last. I own stuff and I don't own it. Take a look at all them and see what you make out of it. I've done give up."

Daniels sat down at the desk briskly and unfolded one document after another, read them through, with Tom looking over his shoulder, his amazement growing.

"How about these contracts, Pruitt? They paid you, did they?"

"Not since '26, they didn't. They didn't pay in five years, nor in seven neither. They ain't paid nothing since that paper was wrote."

"You should file suit then—get your land back."

"Yeah—she said that, too—Mis' Morgan. She said I'd ought to go to law. She wants me to hire that feller Willis Pratt. I was just studying about it. Pratt will want a lot of money for nothing, I reckon—them lawyers always do."

"But—that land must have been worth money. How much have you got, anyway?"

"Upwards of a thousand acres—mountain land. Never could raise nothing on it."

"And these"—Daniels snapped a rubber band about the thick bundle of certificates—"ought to be in a safety deposit box in the bank. I didn't know you owned this big block of stock in the mill. You're a rich man, Pruitt—I'm glad I know you."

"Rich? Me?" Old Tom rubbed his ear. "I just got me a piece of this mill, that's all. Dave Morgan and me worked mighty hard to keep this mill goin'—and I been workin' harder since Dave died. No, I ain't rich. I got no wish to be rich."

"Ever draw any dividends on this stock? Any money for your piece of the mill?"

Tom shook his head. "We agreed not to take out nothing, Mis' Morgan and me. We pay ourselves off every pay-day, just wages. I got all I need. It takes the rest to keep them presses rolling and the hands working. We're both satisfied."

"But you ought to get that land back. You ought to file a claim right away."

"Yeah—I reckon so. Reckon I'll have to get me a lawyer though I sure do hate to pay out money to that Willis Pratt.

"You could sell some of your stock, if you need money. That stuff is as good as cash, you know."

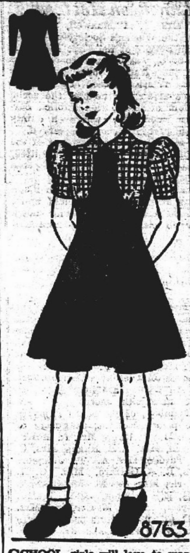
SEWING CIRCLE



SCHOOL girls will love to wear this pretty frock—and it's so very becoming to all of them! Flared at the skirt, wide at the shoulders, design No. 8763 fills them out, at the age when they shoot up like beanpoles. And the high-cut princess skirt scoops in gratifyingly at the waistline.

This pretty frock makes up charmingly in a combination of plaid and plain fabrics, as pictured, but it's very smart in one color, too. The two versions look so different that you'll really get two fashions out of this one pattern. Gingham, linen, percale and chambray are pretty for this. The Old, Old Story

Through the pathless depths of the jungle the intrepid explorer made his way to the hidden village of the great native chief. Bowing low before the awe-inspiring mass of paint, fur, and feathers, he said:

"Just a minute!" said the chief curtly. "Why don't your people do something about the rotten radio programs they've been putting over lately?"

"Most people dare not be natural."

"Why not?"

"Most of 'em would land in the lock-up if they were."

New York Failed to Vote

New York failed to cast its vote for President in the first election, which made Washington President. As the Constitution provided, each state was to appoint presidential electors "in such a manner as the legislature thereof may direct." In some states electors for the first election of 1789 were chosen by popular vote; in others, the legislatures appointed them. The New York legislature could not agree on the manner of selecting the electors. As a result, none was chosen, and New York failed to cast any vote for President.—Pathfinder.

We Can All Be EXPERT BUYERS

- In bringing us buying information, as to prices that are being asked for what we intend to buy, and as to the quality we can expect, the advertising columns of this newspaper perform a worth while service which saves us many dollars a year.
- It is a good habit to form, the habit of consulting the advertisements every time we make a purchase, though we have already decided just what we want and where we are going to buy it. It gives us the most priceless feeling in the world: the feeling of being adequately prepared.
- When we go into a store, prepared beforehand with knowledge of what is offered and at what price, we go as an expert buyer, filled with self-confidence. It is a pleasant feeling to have, the feeling of adequacy. Most of the unhappiness in the world can be traced to a lack of this feeling. Thus advertising shows another of its manifold facets—shows itself as an aid toward making all our business relationships more secure and pleasant.

Opposes Abolition of Ad Valorem Tax

Editor The Sun:

The surprising statement that a city must own its electric light plant and its water plants for the purpose of raising revenues to replace ad valorem taxes, appears in your September 21 issue.

The elimination of property taxes by "shifting to the other fellow," is entirely opposed to the true democratic principles of taxation. It places the burden of paying property or wealth taxes on many who do not even own property.

Dr. E. R. A. Seligman, late Professor of Economics, Emeritus, of Columbia University, the most outstanding authority on equitable tax economics in America, gave three fundamental bases for taxation, at Rollins College address in 1939, as follows:

(1) Property (wealth), (2) Incomes, (3) Business taxes, being the three bases for distributing the modern taxes for fairly maintaining our democratic type of government.

Florida has, by constitutional amendment, abolished one of those tax bases, in order to attract wealthy citizens from the North, many of whom would save enough on their state income taxes to purchase homes and become residents of Florida. But THAT AMENDMENT UNBALANCES OUR TAX SYSTEM and leaves a TWO-BASE STRUCTURE.

To consider abolishing all property taxes is so radical a proposal that even the State Chamber of Commerce, in their referendum on this proposal, only voted one-sixth of its membership in favor of it. That radical measure has never been tried in any state in America yet, for which we are duly grateful.

The last country that experimented with that measure, removing only three-fifths of the total property taxes, was forced to change by revolution, caused by the abuse of the poor through taxation. (The French Revolution, and the economics noted in "Watson's Story of France.")

To shift the whole tax load in a city, county or state, or country, onto BUSINESS taxes, would result in such an increase on the wage-earning class and small property owner as to destroy his buying capacity since the Florida per capita wage is only $420.00

The average salary earned by our citizens is too small to assume the property tax load. Class taxation is the most dangerous of all experiments in a democracy. And this is no time in our economic life to experiment with radical ideas.

Good citizens should be, and are, willing to pay a fair, equitable share of the taxes which are nothing but the democratic sharing of the cost of our governments by all of those who love our freedom and equality.

Good officials should not promote radical experiments in taxation. Their honest duty is to assess taxes equally on all, and then firmly force all to pay. It is unfair, obviously, for the consumers of electric lights to have to bear the burden of the total property tax; the owner of the property should pay his share in the case of rentals, tenants, etc.

Sales taxes are "Poor man's income taxes"—because he spends all he earns. Florida prevents income taxes on "the wealthy."

The Florida Taxpayers Association reports, Highlands County levied $447,573.00 property taxes in 1927, and only levied $201,270.00 for 1938; that is a reduction of 58 percent and if it was equally distributed on all property in the county it would be quite a relief.

Business burdens of taxes have increased 350 percent from 1932 to 1937, and 500 percent since 1926.

An open forum debate in our city by citizens would be an interesting meeting, especially if it brought studied addresses from both sides of questions to be voted on at the next Legislative session. Legislators would appreciate the public opinion on these questions from those who pay the tax bill.

Public Service To Close Office At Noon Saturdays

Compliance with the current provisions of the Federal Wages and Hours Law is necessitating a marked adjustment in Florida Public Service Company working hours. Next week and thereafter, the local district office will close its doors promptly at 1 p. m., on Saturdays instead of at 5 p. m., according to the advices of local company officials. Week-day office hours will remain unchanged, however.

It is indicated that the Saturday afternoon closing will enable the company to reduce the working time of all employees to the 40-hour week set by the Federal government. This low hourly standard has been achieved by paring off ana hour or two during each of three years. The present short work-week will release employees to enjoy mor leisure and health-giving activity.

While thee Saturday afternoon shutdown affects particularly office employees, members of line and service crews will also have their time adjusted to meet the 40-hour standard.

It is not expected that the Saturday afternoon shutdown of all district offices will cause inconvenience to the customers since the trend of merchants throughout America is to the 5-day week. An advertisement elsewhere in this paper suggests calling Telephone 160 for service or in case of line trouble. This action will bring the same prompt, efficient service for which the Florida Public Service Company is noted.
